What is dementia?

As we become older becoming forgetful can be a very normal part of life. In fact only 1 in 100 of us will pass through life without any memory problems. Dementia however is more than simply being a little forgetful. It is a common set of symptoms that occur when the brain is affected by certain diseases that cause damage to brain cells. The chance of developing dementia increases with age.

What changes might occur?

Dementia will affect everyone differently. The symptoms of dementia can include:

- forgetfulness.
- difficulty concentrating e.g. reading.
- difficulty making decisions.
- repeating yourself in conversation.
- finding it difficult to find the correct word.
- misplacing things.
- feeling mixed up with places or people or time.
- seeing or hearing things that are not there.
- losing interest in yourself or your home.

There may be changes in some aspects of personality or a loss of confidence. Any of these changes may understandably lead to increased fear and anxiety. Often the person living with dementia is not aware of the changes or the extent of the changes but their friends or relatives may observe the changes.

Will dementia get worse over time?

Dementia becomes gradually worse over time, this progressive change is usually very gradual allowing time for the person to try and adjust to the changes that are occurring. Many of the symptoms will vary from day to day and can be worse in the evening times. As dementia progresses it gradually affects the person's ability to function independently but support is available to try and help them to maintain their independence for as long as possible.

Will I get dementia if my relative has dementia?

Having a relative who has dementia does not mean that you will develop dementia. Any lifestyle that involves smoking, drinking too much alcohol, not exercising or eating an unhealthy diet increases the risk of developing a dementia in later life. Another risk factor is age; the older we are the greater our risk of developing dementia. Some people develop dementia at a very young age in their 30s, 40s or 50s but this is very uncommon. These individuals have abnormal genes and so their families may be at increased risk of developing dementia.
